Whaling from Force of Habit.

All travellers in those early days from '49 to '69 will recall pleasantly to mind Capt. Ned Wakeman, whose varied career na "sailor man, at your disposal, sah!" has been oft told in song and story.

One dark, tempestuous night in 1862 the old pioneer steamer Panama was the old pioneer steamer Panama was plunging along through a head sea in the Pacific Ocean, off the coast of Lower California. The waves were running mountain high and everything was close-hauled, looking out for breakers. Capt. Ned, on the bridge, dressed in his "sea togs and son wester," peered through the darkness and was thinking doubtless of the pleasures of life on the ocean wave, when suddenly and with no warning the ship struck something, ouivered and when suddenly and with no warning the ship struck something, quivered and trembled for a moment, and then, an-swering his pulls of the bell, the engine was reversed and we backed away from the danger.

Upon a hasty examination it was found that the steamer had not sustained any material injury, and she proceeded on material injury, and she proceeded on the voyage to San Francisco.

What was it? Every soul in the ship rushed on deck; the shock of the col-lision will never be forgotten by any who experienced it, and with blanched faces and terrified questionings the pas-sengers gathered around the captain. He was as cool and impassive as the Subinx.

He was as cool and impassive as the Sphinx.

"My friends," he said, "get back to your bunks. This vessel is all oak and tesk and was originally built for a whaler. She forgot just now that she was a first, class California passenger steamer and could not resist the temptation to go for a fin-back, so she just jumped on a whale, that's all. I only wish we had time to get the blubber!"

Some days later a large whaler, nearly Some days later a large whaler, nearly cut in half, was cast ashore in Mar-

where the collision occurred, and this proved that the captain's theory was the true one, but at the time it was considered as a sailor's yarn, for there were no signs to justify such a conclusion.

This is a true story, though possibly may appear "very like a whale." PURSER.

Did the Child's Prayer Avail?

The bark Phonix was far out at sea when the alarm was given, "Fire in the hold!" Terror struck the Captain, brave man though he was, as he remembered that on board were his wife and child.

Going on deck, he gave the necessary orders to the saliers to close the hatches, pump water on the smoldering mass and then proceeded—hardest task of all—to break it gently to his wife. But she was a plucky woman, yielding not to fear, and gathering together a few articles of ciothing she led their child over to the galley, where as yet the smoke had not penetrated, but it was only a question of time before this place, too, had to be abandoned for the open deck, where for a whole day and night, blackened and well.

whole day and night, blackened and wellnight choked by smoke, that mother and child stood watting their doom.

"Let us say our prayers, mamma," said the little fellow: and there on the wide ocean, which had often sang his lullaby, still far from land, amid the horseorders from the captain and the noisy responses of the crew, that little child sent up his petition to him whom winds and waves obey.

Contrary to all expectations the captain saw all safely landed, the winds being in their favor all the way. Although he bears scars to this day, he never cesses to be grateful for their miraculous escape.

Reas Editor:

We left San Francisco July 21, 1862, on this Golden Gate. At 5 P. M., July 27, the ship caught fire.

I succeeded in reaching the deck, and got into one of the life-boats, which was soon filled with passengers.

As the officer could not lower the boat, he cut the rope at one end, which caused the boat to hang down, and many passengers were drowned; but I clung to it.

He then cut the rope at the other end. The boat capsized, but we got back minus our valuables. Seeing a small boat with an oar upheld and a flag attached, we took it for a signal.

When it neared us we noticed Mr.

Doar and as I looked he suddenly disappeared.

I notified the captain, and he came down with three other sailors. We moved the box and tiere under it lay a man. Of course he was dead. It was believed that he had smuggled himself on board. The ghost was never seen after that.

We were thrown out, and it struck with such a force against mg face that it nearly stunned me. I was reating on the saud, and seeing my companions safe, I called for help, and was rescued just as a wave came to wash me out again.

Besides his Harlem Opera-House, the Columbus Theatre, on East One Hundred and Twenty-fifth street, is almost done, and buildings are being forn down on Forty-second and Forty-first streets, between Broadway and Nixth avenue, in preparation for the rearing of his Murray Hill Theatre. Mr. Hammerstein has secured fine attractions for the Columbus Theatre, and means to make a feature of English opera at the Harlem Opera-House.

Perhaps more than one such meeting between the two big Ciuls could be held each year, and the advocates of the plan in both organizations hope that such may the case. The meetings could be held alternately on the grounds of each.

The discussion of the details of this new scheme is affording ample opportunity for keeping alive the athlietic spirit of the athletes in these two clubs during the hot seeson.

The Manhattans are very anxious to have such a meeting occur this Fall, and having already taken the initiative, are pushing the plan to a consummation. In the Autumn of 1859 I salled from Gloueester, in my brother's schooner, on a fishing voyage. She was wrecked off North Cape, Prince Edward Island, and we took passage for Boston in the brig Naney on the 12th of November.

Among the passengers were several young women. The captain was a stout Englishman, fond of brandy. For two days the weather was delightful. The days the weather was delightful. The girls were singing and enjoying themselves on deck, when the Captain, who had a 'jag' on angrily said:

'The Nancy hasn't washed her face yet. Just wait awhile."

The following day the wind freshened in and at night was blowing a gale. When we entered the Bay of Fundyit was a hurricane. The sea swept our deck, carrying away boats and bulwarks, and dashed through the 'poop' cabin, driving the passengers into the hold.

We lay to the next day and night under a storm staysail. The Captain, who was a 'coaster,' got rattled—bad no idea where he was. He went below very often to consuit his chart—and the brandy bottle—repelling suggestions from my brother, who was a thorough seaman.

The third night of the storm, when we were expecting to be dashed on the rocks, the Cartain, with an unearthly street. Tony Pastor is supplying a rare evening of fun with his excellent company. Tony gave a bang-up show at the Ocean Theatre. Long Branch, last night, with snother fine troups including Bence Bonehill, who made such a hit last last syyear, the robust but vivacious Maggie Kline, and many other elever specialists.

Tony is humping himself to give the public what they want and is succeeding very well in hitting it off to its taste.

KILLED HIS TWENTIETH MAN.

A Resident of St. Louis Who Frotected His Claim,

"He was a very quiet-looking chap too, and at first sight impressed one with his apparent guilelessness and innocence. I suppose it was this that marked him out as the intended prey of the gamblers.

"He got in the train at Chicago, took an end seat and quietly settled himself in the corner next the window, as if preparing to take in the server as he went. twentieth man," said a guest at Hurst's

"He got on the train at Chicago, took a nead seat and quiety settled himself in the corner wext the w.ndow, as if preparing to take in the scenery as he went along. He had hardly got settled when the monte men came along and, casting a glance at him, at once rejected him for their prey. One of them took the seat back of him, while the other two moved up the carsome distance.

"No move was made until the train got safated and had passed the city limits.
Then the spont sitting behind the green-looking passenger bent over, tapped kim out the soonlder and remarked.

"There are gamblers on this train."
"Are there?" quietly queried the soft-looking notividual in the corner, who did not appear to be much interested in the information.

"Yes, I saw them come aboard. I can snot them every time, but I so not care amount them. I am not afraid of them, was the response.

"Well, for that mat'er neither am I. I do not know why I should be afraid of them," I am not much of a sport myself; never play unless invited to do so, but still I know a trick or two, and once in a while risk a dollar or two, inatfor the fun and sequence of the thing.

"It was evident that the tait bad taken and it was not a great while till the other two card handlers were in that corner proposing to do away with the tedium of the journey by a game of cards. An Exemple of a Peculiar Affliction That is by No Means Bare.

A strong, healthy man, who looks like the end of the game I was surprised to see the soft-looking passauger rake in the stakes. I supposed it was only a dodge of the confidence men, though, to draw him out and get him to put up more of the big city buildings yesterday, right up against an elevator, says the Pitiaburg Dispatch. of the confidence men, though, to draw him out and get him to put up more of his money.

"The thing was growing interesting to me, and I warched with some anxiety for the final result; for I fully expected to see the passenger floeced of every ceat he had in his possession. A few more games were played with the same result, and finally the passenger remarked:

"Now, gentlemen, I have got about all the amusement I want of this thing, but I don't want to deprive you of your money. I tell you what I will do: I will put up all I have won, together with the 55 with which I started out propared to lose against what remains of your pile and close up the thing in that way.

"The proposition was accepted, the game was finished and still fortune lavored the quiet looking passenger. He raked in the who le pile.

"Well, gentlemen,' he continued, 'this has been a very unfortunate aftermoon for you and I would be very sorry would move into the basement."
